The Destiny of the Black Line...

They follow the destiny of the black line. Once in a while, they seem to veer from their destination, but the challenges rarely vary and thus when they tend to stray from the line, so do they tend to return to it.

Who are they? They are the students sitting next to other students in a math class or at a basketball game. They are the girls drinking Pepsi at a slumber party or the boys down at Morris's laughing and talking on a Saturday night.

They are the royalty at Homecoming, the captain of the football team, the members of the National Honor Society.

They are the annual recipients of the most dum-dum letters, the teacher's pet (peeve) the bench-warmers on the basketball team.

They are the personalities liked and the personalities disliked; understood and misunderstood; criticized and praised.

They are the people looking forward to August 30th of one year, and to May 31st of the next. They are the people who complain for days about one thing, until something better comes along to complain about; then the first complaints are forgotten. They are the people who are happy most of the time, and unhappy some of the time.

They are the people who can't wait for vacations, and the people who can't wait to get back to their old haunts when vacations become a bore. They are the paper-throwers and the paper-picker-uppers. They are the destructive and the constructive. They pass and they fail.

The black line draws all kinds. The kinds don't matter as much as what the kinds do when united under a common cause. The pursuits of the kinds are similar. The pursuits must be similar in order for the educated—and the uneducated—in the world to survive.

Some of them think that nothing they are doing is worthwhile. Others disagree completely with this line of thought. The black line stretches on, pulling both kinds to its destination.

What is its destination? They can only surmise, but their assumptions can be confirmed as they move toward this destination. The road is long; an old assumption proved true. The road proves many points; a second assumption proved true. The road holds numerable surprises; a third assumption proved true.

The black line is education. They are the one-hundred-eighty-day associates of one another attending Knoxville High School, 1961-1962.

Dedication

e tells them . . .

He teaches them . . .

He tunes them.

He moves his hand, and sound begins. He moves his hand, and sound ends.

Music comes out of the air and fades away. Music is a mysterious element composed of variations of sounds among eighty-eight intervals.

The director guides another's presentations of notes, of times, of key signatures, and brings to the world myriads of sound.

The baton of the director leads and instruments follow. They follow and they sing. They sing harmonious melodies.

The life of the director creates the harmony between band and baton. Each demands the others.

The instruments do not need to know what the director is like in order to follow him. But if they do know what he is like, they can better understand his directing. What is significant in this motion—in that motion? Sometimes they question, but they do sense the significance, and they follow.

Music unites them all—director, band, and baton. Each appreciates the others.

We appreciate the results of director, band, and baton. We are the listeners. We hear, and we speak of what we hear, and we appreciate.

Thus, we dedicate the 1961-1962 Jester to you, Charles Knapp, our director.

Charles Knapp

We know that he is busy, and we are busy too. We rehearse, we sell candy, we enter contests, we take trips, we perform, we pay, we get paid, we converse, we grow.

We sometimes fail to acknowledge who is behind all of these things. But we know.

They have formed standing or sitting

a habit: it is called in line . . .

in line.

They exit in line . . .
to their academics

and they pass from their recreation
in line.

They ask for,
and perhaps too often receive,
permits out of study halls
in line . . .
and they are even refreshed
in line.

F.F.A.

They cooperate on lots of projects. They try their hands at conservation, building, feeding, plowing, planting, harvesting, banqueting, and having an occasional round of fun.

We can recognize them by the jackets they wear or by the friends they run around with. They are indeed a unified group.

They live both indoors and out and would probably like to spend a greater share out.

Their summers are filled with various agricultural obligations, some dealing with school; some not. Their parents stand behind them in these hours and encourage and help and are sure bets when the going gets rough.

County and state fairs take up a good deal of their time, as do the persons they greet there. They learn to judge and to be judged and they survive both.

Perhaps we don't give them enough credit for what they do, but then, who ever receives that credit. We admire them. We wish that we could be as capable as they are. We're glad to have them around to remind us that we depend upon them for survival.

Half-time of a varsity basketball game is not what one might think it to be. Few rest. Most hear what they did wrong or what they did right and are told just what the second half ought to be. They learn to listen.

They practice and practice and practice. They win a few and lose a few. They are a team—composed of individuals. Each must do his part, so each does. Then the coach is happy, the fans are happy, they are happy.

Varsity Baseball

Captain of the 1961 squad, Dennis Ritchie, joins in conversation with coach King and assistant coach McKillip. They all sense that spring is in the air and act upon that sense with a bat, a ball, or a glove, before the first robin has a chance to squeak.

Friendly combat takes place on the home field. This is before the game has begun, of course. Things become more strained as play begins, progresses and ends. The seventh inning means a lot of things to a lot of players—even to the bench-warmers.

Dan stretches his legs and makes a grimace as he clears hurdle number 66829. How many times he has run the race, he is not sure, but each one is a new one and must be run at his best. We can rely upon him. He practices. He thinks.

but soon the steps are reached and they must climb; they rise to the highest social honor given seniors . . .

and the stars that are reached are stars in their crowns; beaming constellations of a star-studded night.

They are all a spectacle on stage. They are a mirage come to life. We watch them process, take their places, and recess. The annual ceremony will always cause hearts to beat a bit faster and thoughts to soar. We will anticipate it every year

Events

They stood in line to eat what they did not want to eat, but the events were fun, and made up for the taste that remained in their mouths after they had returned to classes.

Freshman Initiation

They enter the hallowed portals as green freshmen and occasionally when they leave, they are still green.

They jump over many obstacles that first year. Some of them topple over and some of them fly over and some of them try to sneak under. So it is with all of us. That first year is a good year to learn that the obstacles even exist. A very good year.

They also learn—that other years must follow.

Queen Sharyn Hedbloom and King David Thompson frolic at the freshman fling. The seniors chose them to be most freshman-like, and indeed among the members of the class of 1965 the task was difficult.

The freshmen were tired out after their exercises, but the seniors egged them on. Both classes had fun, as did the onlookers. Whew!

Lawrence got a shoe-shine and the girls giggled. Buckets were used for various and sundry purposes that they never imagined they could serve.

One big villain tried to ruin the plans of everyone, but because of heroic and valiant efforts, he was foiled again. We still like melodramas and we still like to see the good side win. We were satisfied.

Junior Class Play

"Toby Helps Out"

They paint and touch up the original characters to make them resemble play characters. Their job is a tedious, but important one.

CAST

Dayle Palmer	Jane and Geraldine
Patty Conover	Betty Lou
Janice Saline	Mrs. Harvey
John Nelson	Johnny and Murdock
Becky Marks	Molly and Flora
Dean Steele	Dave and Mr. Richard Dare
John England	Mr. Gillin
Bob Tasker	Mr. Brown
John Paulsgrove	Mr. Phelps
Steve Pickrel	Toby and Grandma

They listened as he instructed them in the steps of the stage. Some had taken the steps before and some were taking their first. They walked a long way to the presentations. Their journey proved worthwhile.

Senior Class Play

"Have A Heart"

Mr. Wright directed the play and found three dramatic assistants in Jean, Becky, and Valerie. The combination accomplished their tasks and spotted a few new stars.

CAST

Ellen England	Lou Mansfield
Jeanne Anell	Fritzy Vining

GAA Semi-formal

The tree has always been a symbol of winter things at the winter dance. They would miss it if it weren't there, and they acknowledge it when it is there.

Refreshments are always welcome and they like to pause to eat them. They never seem to get enough of them. Manners must be minded.

Winter whites and winter blacks mingle, fade, and mingle again. A peaceful evening in December brings peaceful thoughts to the dancers. It is a time for reflection.

Dance chairman Sandy Stegall crowns Mary Lou Peterson Gingham Gal. Candidates Thurman, Malone, and Strickland are happy that one has won and all stand honored by their club mates.

FHA Harvest Moon Dance

Square dance music gives them a beat. They will enjoy the dance later and are proud to be a part of the ceremony.

FHA Sweetheart Swing

Wanda Owen was crowned Sweetheart as her attendants honored her by standing by. Sally Pruett, Emilie Washabaugh, and Kay Woolsey were escorted by the FFA officers, Rich Johnson, Eugene Carlson, Fred Voeller, and Willard Gustafson. Wanda reigned supreme with president Gerald Shreeves while sister Linda smiled and Mr. Litchfield was distracted a bit.

Southern Cotillion

The dinner filled some. It didn't fill others. Some couldn't eat. Not very often did they have an opportunity to share the same table or the same bread. This was something unique. They liked it. They were not aware that an occasion similar to this one occurred every year. That didn't matter. This one belonged to them.

They joined in conversation. They joined in thought. They were juniors and seniors. A few more weeks at Knoxville High School, and half of them would be gone. Some of them would know where. Some of them would not. Some could only guess.

The other half would have another year to sit in classrooms. But the next year would be different. They would be seniors. They would be on top. They have been there this year.

We could ask them how it felt—on top. But we don't. They couldn't really answer anyway. It's just a feeling. A nice feeling. An on top feeling.

Next year was far away. And now our next year is not quite so far. We will pursue our goals as usual—and think back once in a while.

Junior-Senior Prom

"Look deeply into my eyes. Deeply. Sleep. Sleep. Sleep. You are still, stiff, rigid. You cannot move. You cannot pull apart your hands. Try. Try. Try." Snap!

They look and look and look—then look away. They talk and smile and primp. The pageantry of the prom has caught them. They are a part of the decorations, the night, the mood. This is an event to remember.

They must wait until the food is cleared, the tables are cleared, the people are cleared. Then they can return. They can dance or not dance. They can leave or stay. They have an evening to themselves.

Couples are the thing, though couples are not necessary for the music, the fun, the dreams. Couples come—and go together. They dance and sit and stop by the punch bowl occasionally. They are participants in the Southern Cotillion.

We meet with them every day. They teach us. They teach us more than we know they teach us. But we do not always realize this. Sometimes we never realize this.

Something else that we may never realize is that we teach them. We teach them more than they know we teach them. They do not always realize this. Sometimes they never realize this.

So the line moves on.

They coach us in our athletics program, they direct our plays, they sponsor our clubs, they advise our classes, they supervise our ticket sales, they purchase our products, they clean up after our messes.

We take the credit and they get the blame. Or, we take the blame and they get the credit. The black line is strange in its contradictions.

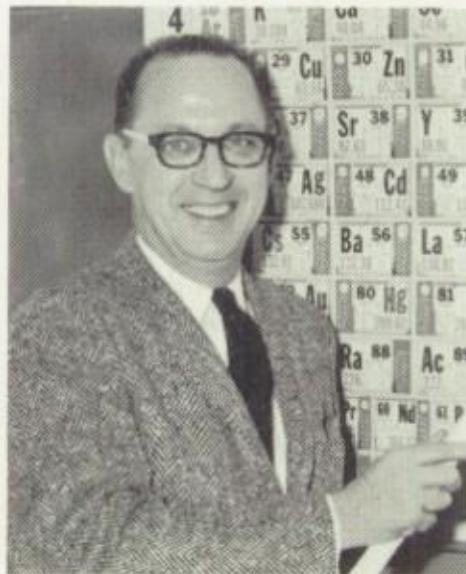

We don't know them as well as we might, but perhaps this is best. Perhaps the black line is supposed to come between us.

The black line teaches us and the black line teaches them—well.

Help! Tasker and the gang are in for a free-for-all. They don't care who comes out on top. After all, the one on the bottom doesn't have to fight as hard as the rest.

They look and they wonder. The world is confusion and a finger to a chin indicates the unsolved mysteries found on the way down stairs. The puzzle? Sandy has a knife in her hand—and is on her way to disserve a birthday cake.

They seem to be with us everywhere.
They are seniors. Can we escape them?
Not very easily. Everyone has to be one before he graduates.

We have come far in twelve years, but no further than other seniors have ever come. All of us will follow the black line of education still further, in one way or another. That is a promise which life bestows upon us. It is a responsibility. We never stop learning.

The school has played its part and now we must play ours. Each of us has the starring role—and each is a supporting actor or actress in the world-play.

Now is the time for reflection—the time to look back along the black line. Where it has led us is visible. Now we can re-examine, act upon, what we have gained from the past.

How quickly we have become adults. We are young men and women. We have grown—physically and mentally—unless we have permitted ourselves to regress. If the latter is the case, we have a problem. How can we meet tomorrow? We can but try.

We have been taught, and if we did not learn, we know that the lack is in part our fault. Perhaps we have learned something from not listening—that we will listen next time. We might have to.

The dream began with a baseball diamond, some dirt, some sand, and some space.

The blocks and arches rose above the ground and waited for a completion.

Doors and windows and roofs were given form and people wondered about it.

They built of necessity;

Jensen Gymnasium

The old gym had shown too many signs of wear for too many years. The time had come to build a new one several years before enough money could be acquired to accomplish the project. Then one day a bond issue was passed positively and a new structure took form.

We watched its slow growth and anticipated entering a finished product in the spring. Spring did not bring our hope, but brought instead, disaster of a sort. We found ourselves without even the building which for so long had been too small and too old.

What we had been so prone to criticize before, we now found to be of great necessity. We needed what we did not have. We realized that appreciation comes too late.

We wished that it could have been put to use this year, but use was to be left to the classes of the 1962-1963 term. We could be happy for them—and we could return to wish it well.

and later found necessity to be double necessity.

It burned quickly on a chilly March morning. Some of us watched it go and later, when we looked at what was left, felt something missing in our lives. Some of us laughed about it until we thought about it. We lost in it—athletic equipment, GAA files, clothes, class rings, library books, assemblies, dances, a place to play, coke and candy machines, Zeke's home, and many, many memories. Now we see only a black line.
